Excerpt from A Sketch of Historical Geography The author of this admirable sketch of historical geography was fortunate in having had a father who was himself an eminent geographer. The father made geography the ruling and entirely absorbing interest of his life. He certainly did more than any previous author to popularise the science. Dying in June 1871, Dr. Alexander Keith Johnston left an only son, who was born on the 24th of November 1844. Young Keith Johnston was trained specially by his father, and by private tutors, to be a geographer, and at the age of twenty-two he entered Mr. Stanfords establishment as a draftsman and compiler of maps. In 1867 he went to Germany for a year, to visit the geographical establishments and make himself master of the language, and he then imbibed that habit of painstaking thoroughness in study and work which is apparent in all he afterwards did. After his fathers death Keith Johnston settled in London, where he drew many valuable maps and wrote much for gazetteers.
