The main object of a beginner in Psychology is to acquire psychic insight and familiarity with method, and I have tried to keep this end in view in this little book. The student from the very beginning should be told as little as possible, but should learn and conclude for himself from the simplest observations and experiments. Hence the teacher should see that the scholar in all cases does the original exercises at the point indicated in his own reading, writing them in the blank pages provided at the end of the book; and the teacher should to some extent repeat and expand these exercises in the class. I have given no references to other books, and outside reading I consider to be confusing to the beginner; though, of course, the teacher should be familiar with the standard literature of the subject. In my opinion Psychology should be a subject for the high school, academy and secondary school, and this sketch is particularly designed for such work, but will, I hope, be found useful with beginners of any age, especially with those studying without a teacher, and in summer schools. As will be obvious, my method has been to give complete continuity to the treatment, and to proceed from the known to the unknown, the particular to the general, and to incite constant original and vigorous activity on the part of the student. The teacher in assigning lessons should bear in mind that each original exercise is equal to at least one page of text, and that the main work of the recitation period should be the ascertaining that each student has practical mastery of the subject...
