Not illustrated. 1891 Excerpt: .as a nucleus, which then became enveloped by a thin film of silica, thickening slowly into regular agate-bands of various tints, through deposition on the surface. This phenomenon was first observed at the bottom of one of the test-tubes, which during the writer's absence in the field had been neglected for nearly two years, and in which the metallic salts (chloride of gold and sulphate of iron) were exhausted. Above the layers of agate a dendritic siliceous structure had been developed, and over this again a cloudy deposit of micro-crystalline silica, which surrounded the metalliferous fibres and extended to the end of the tube (a distance of fully twelve inches). Wherever this siliceous deposit touched the wall of the tube it showed plainly metallic gold, partly in microscopic crystals arranged in star-like groups, partly in bright lamina and symmetrical octahedrons. The experiments here described are of course incomplete and to be regarded as a preliminary to more exhaustive inquiry. For nearly two years, during which the writer was engaged in the exploration of Trans-Pecos Texas, the test-tubes were not attended to, and since the renewal of the investigation the time has been too short for definite conclusions. Nevertheless the experiments would, so far, appear to establish the following points, viz.: 1. It is principally the iron which, in silico-ferruginous fissureveins, brought the other metals from greater to (by mining) accessible depths. 2. Most siliceous ore-leads, carrying also large quantities of iron and having silico-ferruginous outcrops,...
