Excerpt: .certainly constitutes an element which is not to be despised. The yellow fever has not yet invaded the interior of Brazil, and it has shewn itself in some places, and not in others, of the coast; it has prevailed for many years, and at more or less too short intervals for the contagion to have amplified the area (in case it found localities hitherto exempt from it) and the means adapted for planting the seeds of the malady. Therefore it is from the mud of the sea that the cause ought to be sought; and as the scourge did not, for long years, attack all the inhabited places washed by the ocean, it is to be inferred that such a cause is not virtually in the waters, but in the conditions which modify them, saturating them with morbid elements. In concluding, I would say...
