Excerpt from The Anatomist's Instructor, and Museum Companion: Being Practical Directions for the Formation and Subsequent Management of Anatomical Museums A careful perusal of this publication will, I sincerely trust, enable the student to benefit much more than hitherto from attending lectures, whether of Anatomy or Physiology, and more especially Pathology. In visiting museums, I am perfectly satisfied (notwithstanding all that is said to the contrary), that the student has hitherto derived little or no advantage; to him they are, in fact, sealed books. Lectures on Anatomy are, or should be, perfectly finished demonstrations, combining as many illustrations or proofs as is possible, of the facts more immediately under the lecturer's consideration. There can be, I presume, but one Opinion of the importance of museums to a teacher. It is a fact that Dr Barclay (the most successful teacher that ever lived) demonstrated the arterial and venous system solely from dry preparations. Many Objections have been urged against this practice; and although I admit that it is highly objectionable, yet it seems to me the best which can be adopted, considering the extremely limited period to which the course of anatomy is confined, and more particularly during the existing regulations regarding dissection. A perusal of the following pages will also explain to the student the true nature of vascular preparations; and, being put on his guard as to the faults and imperfections under which they labour, the beginner even may study them with comparative safety.
