A California Baseball Odyssey, 1965-91 is built around the scorebooks kept by the author as he explored and experienced every layer of baseball in America's most populous state - first as a young minor league fan and later as a journalist covering major league baseball during its Bay Area apex. It is a diary originally transcribed in baseball's first language, created by Henry Chadwick when he invented the baseball box score in 1859, and it is a chronology written from the same standpoint as Roger Angell's classic baseball anthologies, but seen through a uniquely California prism. Hey, I Was At That Game! A California Baseball Odyssey, 1965-91 includes first-hand descriptions of some of baseball's most transcendent moments, such as Kirk Gibson's home run to win Game 1 of the 1988 World Series, and the Loma Prieta earthquake that halted the 1989 World Series. It also includes a first-person remembrance of the pitcher who in 1973 completed the only perfect game in the history of...
