CHAPTER XVIII CARIBEE SHOOTS THE RAPIDS OF THE IRON GATES THE 18th of August was a very hot day in the year 1891, at least to me. There was scarcely a breath of wind; I had been paddling from 7 in the morning until nearly noon; the Servian shore seemed as uninteresting as the Hungarian, and even the singing and piping of the peasants on the banks failed to stimulate me. Two frontier soldiers on the Hungarian side promised a momentary diversion. They shot out at me from behind a reedy island, one rowing, the other steering. Oh! for a fair wind I prayed, what a dance might I then have led them--though when they had headed me off, and I noticed two rifles within convenient reach, I remembered that frontier guards along this river have a reputation for shooting on slight provocation. Our...
