Brand New Book  Print on Demand .Excerpt from Oceanography 1951: A Report on the Present Status of the Science of the Sea Sea water is a complex chemical system that has greatly influenced the evolution of life. It contains almost all of the chemical elements, many of which take part, even in extreme dilution, in biological and other processes as diverse as the growth of plants and the cementation of loose sand into sandstone. Rainfall and evaporation of water at the sea surface and the run-off from the land both tend to change the chemical composition of sea water locally. Despite this, the relative proportions of its major constituents are almost constant over the whole world and at all depths.
