FBC LTD, 2017. Paperback. Condition: New. Language: English . Brand New Book  Print on Demand . Excerpt from Foreign Agriculture, Vol. 24: September, 1960 As a result, many sectors of the Japanese economy have developed under the protective umbrella of controls. Agriculture and industry alike have been shielded from foreign competition or have learned to live with import controls. A variety of special interests has been created. Here, as elsewhere, an elected government can not simply ignore these interests; rather it must consider how best to reconcile them with its international commitments and with the broad needs of the nation. Trade-to-live. Further, although the Japanese economy has enjoyed a decade of remarkable growth, the country's industrial life still depends on foreign sources for such key-items as wool, cotton, petroleum, iron ore, steel scrap, and coking coal. The Japanese people know that the nation must trade to live, that an unfavorable trend in international trade will threaten jobs and the standard of living, and that without export earnings the country cannot buy the raw materials it needs to function as a modern state. Any government in Tokyo must take into account this public awareness of Japan's dependence on trade. As a result, added weight is given to the tendency to be cautious about actions that might cause imports to grow faster than export earnings.
