The method was based upon the presence of esters in the oil which are probably responsible for the characteristic fragrance of the hops. It is known that there is a variation in odor in certain volatile oils due to the quantity of esters present. Lavender oils of different origin are known to differ in agreeableness of odor due to the varying quantity of esters present. This is also true of peppermint oils. It is not therefore unlikely that volatile oils distilled from hops of different origin would also reveal varying quantities of esters and thus account for the variable odor of the hops. While it is agreed that there are other constituents in the oil of hops...
