He soon outgrew his awkward manners and became a graceful and dignified prince of dogs. He knew so much that it seemed at times as though he longed to tell us what he was thinking about. If he could not speak in our language, he could express his thoughts so clearly at times that no one could misunderstand him. Prince was so neat and trustworthy that he was allowed the freedom of the house, a privilege which he never abused. He was always on hand in the morning to greet each member of the family with a loving look, and a hearty wag of his glossy, shaggy tail. He had the most expressive eyes of any dog I ever saw. They followed so unceasingly every movement and mood of my sister, whom he loved above all else, that they seemed at times to see nothing besides; yet Prince took in all that was going on about him. One afternoon when my sister had been left alone. in the house with Prince, two of her young lady friends called. During the call his highness appeared at the door of the reception room with a very sad expression upon his face. My sister, thinking that the downcast looks were caused by the dogs knowledge of the fact that he was out of his place, said, Prince, old fellow, why are you here Immediately the knowing dog disappeared, as though he...
