Brand New Book  Print on Demand .Excerpt from The Edinburgh Review, Vol. 190: Or Critical Journal; For July, 1899;;; October, 1899; To Be Continued Quarterly The next epoch covered the succeeding fifty years, and was definitely terminated by 1875. Finance was a burning subject in those days, and its two chief exponents, Peel and Gladstone, rose naturally to supreme place. One led the Conservative, and the other the Liberal, party, but both were scholars in the same school, and were as father and son in the service of the commonwealth. Thus finance made its exit as it were from the arena of party politics, and a steady and consistent national policy was pursued. One main idea that dominated in the councils of this middle age was restriction in expenditure. For many years this principle met with such general acceptance that in 1853, the year prior to the outbreak of the Crimean War, the expenditure stood at the very figure with which the epoch in question began. Then ensued a formidable contest of opposing views, in which the leading champions were Palmerston for a more liberal outlay, and Gladstone for the old policy of restriction. For about ten years from 1853 expenditure grew rapidly, thanks in the main to the Crimean War and the Indian Mutiny. But in 1862 a motion for economy was carried in the House of Commons, and shortly after retrenchment resumed its reign. Some years later, in 1870, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in making his budget speech, after announcing certain reductions in the army and navy expenditure, proceeded to inquire into the cause of the singular prosperity in our national finance. The secret of all this success, he said, is the simplest in the...
