Brand New Book. Excerpt from The Eucharistic Teaching of S. Augustine In such a state of things going on under his own eyes, it is not strange that the teaching of the great African Doctor should be shaped accordingly, and aimed at a correction of evils and abuses, under which they had suffeted so deeply, so long. Such a purpose is apparent throughout this extended commentary on the Gospel of S. John which, though divided into a hundred and twenty four separate parts, called tractates or treatises in the Benedictine edition of his works, consists in reality of that number of popular discourses delivered in a regular course of instructions to his spiritual charge, and therefore with great propriety called sermons or homilies in some of the manuscripts. When the Easter-tide came round, (it is thought to have been in the year A. D. 416,) he interrupted the delivery of them, to take up in the same way a running practical commentary on the Epistle of the same Evangelist, in a series of homilies, which are almost one continued argument and exhortation to unity, with a view to composing the differences and distractions occasioned by the Donatists. If we are in unity, he asks with bitter irony, what have two altars to do in this city? Indeed, Augustine himself, in the forty-seventh tractate of the Gospel series gives this account of the purpose which he had constantly in view. Of the one fold and one Shepherd, he says, you are wont to hear from us continually; for we have greatly commended that one fold, preaching unity,...
