SECTION I LESSONS OF THE WAR REHABILITATION OF WOUNDED SOLDIERS MAJOR ARTHUR D. DEAN Rehabilitation Division, Surgeon Generals Office The human wreckage of war in the light of modern methods of rehabilitation is no longer the object of gushing sentimentality and paternal benevolence on the one hand or the subject of coldblooded scientific application of knife, saw and medicine on the other. We have learned many things from this War, not the least of which is the fact that to restore a broken man to the maximum of strength in the minimum of time, it is necessary to engage his mind and such physical capacities, however limited, as he may possess, in graded and constructive work. The miracles of surgery are no greater than the miracle of the will to be well, and it is with this will to be well that we of the Rehabilitation Division of the Army are concerned. I have visited forty-five Army Hospitals in the past six months and with your permission I will review the work that is now being done for our wounded soldiers. I am thinking of a place--a little town of a few hundred inhabitants, but recently increased by two thousand hospital occupants, up in the North Carolina mountains. The medical service and the surgical service are just about completed; and there are coming in to those wards now, in this tubercular hospital, young women called occupational therapists, or reconstruction aids No. 2--the reconstructional aids being...
