Excerpt: . . . men, it must still be watched by a human eye, directed by a human brain and controlled by human hands. True, there are automatic machines that work with marvelous effect; but there is not one that does not require human supervision and attention at some stage of its operation. The human element is indispensable. Factories--as well as stores, banks, railroad companies, electric power plants, professional offices and productive businesses of various kinds--will always require intelligent workers. Selecting the workers for the factory thus becomes one of the most important tasks of factory management. A few years ago in every factory each foreman hired and fired for his own department. Modern management has generally discarded this illogical method. The foreman is a specialist in the problem of his department; he cannot be expected to p-g be an infallible judge of men. Moreover, when each foreman...
