The parents, teachers and scholars in every district seem to have co-operated in most things pertaining to the general advancement of their several schools. Most of our teachers, though many of them are young and inexperienced, have proved themselves capable, efficient and devoted, thereby meeting the reasonable expectations of the parents, and securing the confidence and esteem of the scholars. Although our schools are deserving of much praise, yet we believe they are not without many defects. We would have our teachers impart knowledge in a more practical manner, thus enabling the pupil to obtain an education that will be of use to him in after years.
