In reviewing the old theories of the verb, it was proved to you that the imperative and subjunctive moods are only visionary. Now turn to the conjugation of the potential mood of the verb to lave in any ordinary grammar. 200. Look at might, could, should, mould, in the past tense of that conjugation, and then look at could in No. 258, in what the same grammarians call the present tense, and likewise at their present anil past potential signs, may and might, in the future tense. Such things cannot but be held up to the ridicule of discerning minds. The authors of the potential mood, might reasonably be denominated manufacturers, because their conjugation has more the appearance of being constructed by machinery, than by any effort of human understanding. 261. This will insuperably second the assertion, that the...
