Excerpt from The Early Romantic Drama at the English Court: A Dissertation Submitted to the Faculty of the Graduate School of Arts and Literature in Candidacy for the Degree of Doctor of Philosophy Perhaps it would not be out of place to add a word in explanation of the reasons that led me to include a discussion of the play Common Conditions in a dissertation which purports to deal with the survival of mediaeval literary conventions in the sixteenth century court drama. If my conjecture be correct, the story upon which that play is based reached the dramatist not through mediaeval channels, but in the form of an Italian novella. Nevertheless, the story is characteristically mediaeval. The affiliation with the legend of St. Eustace and its analogues is sufficient proof of this. Furthermore, there could be no more striking indication of the strength of the heroic tradition in Elizabethan drama at this period than the care of the dramatist to supply whatever conventions were lacking in the narrative version. There is, to be sure, no direct evidence that Common Conditions was ever presented at Court; but in view of the extraordinary demand for acceptable drama, the assumption that so good a play was not overlooked by the Master Of the Revels can hardly seem wholly unwarranted. Besides, I should like to repeat that I make no claim for the court play as a distinct genre. It is the character of the drama during an important period in its history that we are interested in tracing; and, since Common Conditions is one of the few surviving representatives of the kind of dramatic activity with which this dissertation is concerned, its...
