Excerpt: . . . 11 tion of each member, some use of the North American Industry Classification Sys-tem (NAICS) codes to sort revenues by general source might be used. The category in which the organization falls should then dictate the additional public disclosure. For a trade association composed almost entirely of corporate members from a given industry, ASAE suggests that the additional financial disclosure be confined to the volume of annual revenues and expenditures, and then to the magnitude of expenditures on legislative lobbying, regulatory lobbying, public relations to improve the industrys image, research of potential benefit to the economy, standards-setting to improve public safety, and all other areas of activity. For a 501 (c) (3) professional organization that does not solicit funds from the gen-eral public, and which receives little charitable contribution money, if any, the pub-lic inspection version of...
