Not illustrated. 1885 Excerpt: .When summer s sun s bright, burning rays, Cause servants lag, on sultry days; The windows, up all day he holds, And neither eate, nor fights, nor scolds, Some time before my revered Father s death I presented him with a New Testament having print very large. On its fly-sheet I inscribed the following: Dear Father, read this larger print, And if its lines you see; Whene er you kneel to humbly pray, Oh! then, remember me. And if you leave us here behind And pass to yonder shore, To see the Saviour and to greet Those loved ones gone before. Thy children then will read these lines, And love the Saviour too, That we may meet with those we love And be for aye with you. Your fond son, Glen-Allen, October, 1869. WILLIAM. DEATH. DEATH. Death is a word all mankind fear, It fills with pain the timid ear; Deep in our frame it sets its fangs, And fills the heart with rending pangs. As lightnings flash from pole to pole, It sends a thrill right through the soul; And like the swiftly passing clouds, It brings to view our dreaded shrouds. Such solemn words we all respect, Yet e en these words we soon neglect, But death, itself, is ne er forgot Either by sage or Hottentot. When strangers breathe their last short breath, And pass the lonely vale of Death, We may forget when months or years, Have passed away like by-gone fears....
