VIII THE GREAT IF In my previous chapters I have told the Front what I could of the rising tide of munitions, of what they may expect from the gigantic effort that is at last being made in war work. I have said, judging from what I have seen, nothing can stand against our armies and the torrent of shells and munitions they will assuredly have from and after the spring--if the war-workers play out their part. That is the one and only if, but in the war works I have seen and heard some indication that the if still remains, and now I want to say a word as one who went through that first winter and a year at the Front, to the workers at Home, to ask the men in the trenches to write home to any and every man or woman they may know...
