Excerpt: . those names, appears remarkably, from the fact that they were accompanied by a thirst after more. He that was already so wise was still a learner, placing himself at the feet of the well-instructed, both hearing them and asking them questions. Superficial attainments are commonly attended with self-satisfaction and self-elation. Particularly is it so with young minds, which have, perhaps rapidly, acquired some imposing, but merely elementary knowledge; for shallow draughts intoxicate the brain, but drinking largely sobers it again. While yet at the commencement only of his journey, and while yet but a small section of the field of science is perceptible to his eye, the sanguine traveller regards with much complacency the progress that he has made, but as he moves onward the prospect gradually opens before him, until plains, immeasurably spread, seem lengthening as he goes. But the danger of...
