HAVE now given a general view of the Walcheren Intermittent fever, and stated the treatment which was commonly pursued for its removal, where no adverse circumstances interfered, and prevented its adoption. The Walcheren Intermittents were not common cases, not such as would, to use a sporting phrase, afford a man fair play, they were so combined with dangerous and perplexing symptom as at times to baffle experience and render the efforts of art fruitless. In a stomach irritable in the extreme, how could bark, or the usual medicines, be given with safety? how could they be exhibited without danger? and when the intestinal canal was irritable, and disposed to success in their favor, is not always safe because not always safe, and all that can be done in situations so unpromising is cautiously to attempt to do good, but still more cautiously to avoid doing harm. In the first place, it is not safe to administer the cuprum, or zincum vitriolatum? Again where difficult respiration, pain of the breast, and distressing cough existed with a severe Quotidian Intermittent common remedies were positively forbidden, and when in addition to these symptoms there was often visceral disease, anasarca or swellings, and great oedema, it was not safe to administer the cuprum. The Walcheren Intermittents were often attended with putrid pneumonia synpnoea and such cases were always extremely fatal for Avhile pain of the breast/difficulty of breathing disressing cough, and troublesome expectoration existed it was impossible to administer any effectual...
