At Cone 05: fire shrinkage, 7 per cent, and absorption, 4 per cent. From Wytheville to Marion the railroad follows the limestone belt, and the cuts expose residual clay. Some of these may be noted, although the extent of the deposits is not known. Rural Retreat.--Residual clay from limestone can be seen in the railroad cut one-half mile southwest of the station. SMYTH COUNTY. Groseclose.---The road cut just north of station shows shaly limestone, and there is also shale in cuts along the track, three-fourths of a mile northeast of the station, but neither of these is promising. Residual clay from limestone shows in the cut one mile northeast of station, and in another cut 1 1/2 miles from town. Marion.--The limestone belt at Marion is about 4 miles wide, and a narrower belt lies about 5 miles south of Marion, being crossed by the Marion and Rye Valley Railroad to Fairwood. In the main belt, at least, there are several shale deposits, which are referred to on page 63. Residual clay from the limestone can be seen at several points, but there are no large sections exposed. It has, however, been utilized on a small scale for the manufacture of brick. Several samples were collected and submitted to a partial series of tests. These are given below: 1. Locality, 1 mile north of Marion (Field No. 74), and just north of the fair grounds. This is a dark-brown residual clay...
