Excerpt from The Journal of Nervous and Mental Disease, Vol. 51: An American Journal of Neurology and Psychiatry; January-June 1920 In this paper I wish to Show how the postural tensions Of auto nomic segments, stimulating the proprioceptors buried in their tis sues, and the enteroceptors in the mucous membranes, give rise to afferent streams Of feeling which constitute the affective cray ings (popularly known as emotions or sentiments) and which, as our wishes, determine our thoughts and behavior. I would like to Show how this probably occurs and how we may use the concept in our professional work. Such astute physiologists as Cannon and Carlson, after they had perfected the technique Of studying the gastric motor functions that cause an intragastric itching or crav ing, that is, hunger for food, had to depend upon an introspective study of themselves in order to correlate the type of feeling or craving which was aroused by a certain type of gastric contrae tion. This emphasizes decisively that it is Of the utmost impor tance for the physician to train himself to be able to introspectively...
