Excerpt: . . . it, with the fond hope, that the task of visiting it may be never again repeated. Betwixt Versailles and St. Germain are the useless aqueducts and waterworks of Marly. The park and chateau built by Louis XIV. have disappeared, And smiling Ceres re-assumes her reign. On the road from St. Germain to Paris is the modest Malmaison, now the property of Eugene Jjeauharnois. It is a neat white house, with the air of a respectable English gentlemans seat, and is surrounded by shrubberies laid out in the English manner. The neighbourhood of Paris on the right bank of the Seine, presents objects of more universal interest. Those I have mentioned are rather drafts upon the travellers patience, than materials for his enjoyment. The Heights Of Montmartre will not be slightly passed by. The martyrdom of St. Denis, from which they take their name, cannot indeed be expected powerfully to interest the foreigner, who usually thinks it sufficient to venerate the saints and martyrs of his own country; the reader of English history will, however, recall the meeting which took place here betwixt Henry II. Louis VII. and the arrogant Becket, who was destined to furnish England with a saint equal to St. Denis himself. A more recent event for which Montmartre may claim to be remembered, is the foundation of the order of the Jesuits, laid in its church by the vow of Ignatius Loyola, and his seven companions, from which period the order...
