Equally uninteresting is the present practice of dessicating a few short stories each term for the story hour. And to one s surprise very few of these tell of Hawaiian life or customs, although hundreds of the most beautiful local legends and myths could be made available. The work of reading is stilted and spiritless. Words are recited glibly in spite of the difficulties of pronunciation; and phrases and sentences, even pages, are memorized and rendered verbatim. To add to the monotony, the fifth-grade pupils are obliged to repeat the fourth-grade reader. The literature work of the upper grades is not very much better. Stories and essays selected from American classics need to be more carefully considered before being adopted for the grammar grades of Hawaii, no matter how inspirational they may be to children in mainland schools. It is evident that..
