A net premium is one in the calculation of which due allowance has been made for the interest which a company may receive upon its investments, but with no allowance for the expenses of the business. Thus far we have, for the sake of simplicity, neglected the question of interest. But, since a company may realize considerable amounts in the way of interest upon judiciously invested funds, not needed for present use, it is plain that, in determining the premium which it is necessary to charge, due consideration of this source of income should be had. Obviously, the rate of premium will be reduced by the fact that interest receipts are to be added to the company's income. If too great a reduction is made, however, the premium will not be sufficient. And, as life insurance contracts may...
