Brand New Book  Print on Demand .Excerpt from Physical Chemistry and Scientific Thought: An Inaugural Lecture Delivered at the University of Liverpool on Friday, 16 January, 1914 Ladies and Gentlemen. - At the outset I should like to say that the subject-matter of my remarks this afternoon can scarcely be regarded as novel. There are, however, one or two points which, although not new, are sufficiently important in themselves to merit emphasis, especially if, as I presume is the case, there are some here who may have recently decided to devote themselves to some branch of science as their life's work. The considerations which I wish to bring before you may be dealt with in the following order. In the first place I should like to say a little about philosophic ideas and principles in general, and then to pass on to that department of philosophy which we distinguish as natural philosophy or science, considering as a special case the two closely allied sciences of chemistry and physics which together have given rise in relatively recent years to the science of physical chemistry. Lastly I shall say a word regarding the significance of research, especially in connection with some of the problems of physical chemistry. I should like, first of all, to draw your attention to that process of the mind which we call thought. Thinking may be defined as the activity of the mind which discovers the order, arrangement and system in the reality that the senses reveal. Without thought our felt experience would be a chaos, and not a world. Serious thought is, to my mind, to be distinguished from the untrained and unco-ordinated exercise of thinking by the quality...
