Not illustrated. 1852 Excerpt: . . . had learned to know and love its voice; and now, that its destruction was threatened, a thousand hearts thrilled with fear of its loss or throbbed with hope of its salvation. Still the devouring element crept on apace, and still, like the old sacristan of Saint Nicholas, stood the ringer at his post, and still went on the loud clanging alarum of the bell. Soon the pillars which supported the dome of the belfry were wrapt in sheets of flame, but the alarm peal still rang as if the imprisoned monster was yet undespairing, and cried aloud to the rescue. Then the falling timbers and flakes of fire drove the ringer from his post. For a while the bell still pealed on in a clamorous appealing to the mercy of the fire, till at last the wheel on which it hung was...
