FBC LTD, 2017. Paperback. Condition: New. Language: English . Brand New Book  Print on Demand . Excerpt from The Creighton Chronicle, Vol. 7: Jan. 20, 1916 The time-honored conception of a college course was that it should evolve and discipline all the mental powers latent in youth, thus effecting an all-around intellectual development which would enable the young man, upon his entrance into the arena of civil life, to meet and solve the problems there confronting him. Should he desire to pursue thereafter any special course of training, say in one of the learned professions, the university was there to answer his need, whose doors however would open to him only on presentation of his passport, the diploma of the college testifying to his mental fitness to engage in such special study. Such, for more than two centuries, was the almost universally accepted idea of a collegiate education in America, but with the dawn of the nineteenth century, the restlessness so characteristic of American life, the tendency to experiment, which frequently, - but not always - means progress, brought about the injection of new ideas in educational circles. The period was a critically transitional one, especially in two great fields of human activity; first, in that of political economy, the revolt of the democracy against the age-old aristocratic dominance, and secondly, in that of the physical sciences, which then began to foreshadow their boundless potentialities in the way of ministering to human needs and comforts, in the amelioration of physical conditions of living. The increased, and ever daily increasing sum of human knowledge made it incumbent upon the schools, according to these progressivists, not to lose any of the precious time of plastic youth, in giving their scholars the special training from childhood up, which...
