J DEGREES- EARLY five years have passed away since that letter was written from Venice, and nothing further has ever been heard of Ellen. Letters written from home have remained unanswered, and all inquiries have proved fruitless. It was to no purpose that Nicholas Artemvitch himself went to Venice, and thence to Zara, after the conclusion of the war: in Venice he only learned what the reader already knows, and in Zara he could meet with no one who was able to give him any positive information either respecting Renditch, or the ship in which he and Ellen had set sail from Venice. There were indeed mysterious rumours of the sea, during a heavy storm some four or five years back, having washed ashore a black coffin, in which was found the corpse of a man. But according to other and more trustworthy reports, this coffin was not washed ashore by the sea, but was brought and buried near the sea-shore by a foreign lady who had just arrived from Venice: some even added, that she had been later seen at Herzhaven with the army that was then being levied, and they also described her as being dressed in black from head to foot. However all this may be, every trace of Ellen has been lost, and no one knows whether she is living, whether she has sought refuge in some distant and foreign land, whether the short comedy of...
