Revolted, humbled, nothing I despair d, Nor long my marvelling that thus I fared; Soon I discern d, as on a day it chanced, My vagrant eye upon a mirror glanced, My air how wayward, how unwonted wild! And tho in that clear eye my spirit smiled, The seared and shaken frame too plainly show d, What thoughts had made of it their dread abode: --The signs of fiendly visitings were seen, The scathings where a mighty scourge had been. So earth s deep scars, when wild tornadoes cease, Remain to wound the bright blue eye of peace, Warning the timid stranger from the land, That so may feel the demon s wrathful hand. No matter;--they might pity, scorn, or shun, Yet was I not of all abandon...
