THE GOLDEN GATE TO NEW YORK BY WAY OF CAPE HORN. On Sunday evening, October 4th, while we were all sitting about the library tea table, the dispatch I had been awaiting from Mr. Arthur James upon his arrival in San Francisco, came. It ran: I am willing you should go with the Coronet around Cape Horn, provided you can stand many discomforts and mess with the captain. Coronet sails about the twelfth, due in New York February. It brought a sort of gale off Terra del Fuego into our home circle; but we soon eased our mainsheets and I was off to the telegraph office to send my answer. It was: Accept with thanks chance to go with Coronet under conditions you state. Monday night I left Syracuse, and Saturday morning we breakfasted in Sacramento, crossing the Karquinez Strait on the mighty railroad ferry. I had known much of the Coronet and seen her photographs. Of course I was pretty impatient to make a closer acquaintance. To visit her where she lay at the Pacific Street pier, just beyond the massive Australian liner, Mariposa, was my first object. I could not fail to be delighted with her appearance. I have yet to learn her qualities as a sailing vessel. As an ocean home she is palatial. She has all the beauty common to such pleasure yachts in burnished brasswork of rail and binnacle, figured ground-glass skylights, and tapering, gilt-lined...
