Excerpt from Federal Government Technology Transfer and Commercialization Programs: Hearing Before the Subcommittee on Economic Growth and Credit Formation of the Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs, House of Representatives, One Hundred Third Congress, First Session, October 21, 1993 I should comment that the law changed in 1986, and prior to that, we were performing this kind of service for most Federal agencies. When the Technology Transfer Act of 1986 developed the basis for cooperative research and development agreements at individual agencies, there was a decentralization that took place on patent and licensing. We do less work for some of the larger agencies like nist and nih than we did in the past, but we are now doing an increasing amount of work for some of the smaller agencies that have not really had patent licensing programs before. So this effort, although there was a major change in 1986 because of the change in the law, this effort is really growing at nts. Let me finish with a few comments that are intended to tie this together for you. I believe we really intend to think of technology transfer in terms of whether a Federal research project yields some kind of proverbial better mousetrap, and I think the simple fact is that historically much Federal technology has been developed for very narrow mission purposes and it is often at too early a stage, what we call proof of principle stage or prototype stage, to really have an easily identifiable commercial potential, or for that matter, to excite a corporate sponsor.
