He was a prosperous farmer, a man just passing his prime; And still a husky fellow who was always pressing the time. From early morning hours his pace would weary a fox, He worked with a three man power as patiently as an Ox. He had the mind of a Plato, the loins of Hercules; He had the smile of a master and the art of working with ease. He could laugh at rain out of season and grin each day of the drouth; Was always on taps at meal time and seldom down in the mouth. For years, perhaps about forty, he fought with weather and soil; Attained success as a farmer and had considerable spoil. He was not classed as a Christian, for he never joined the church; And he had slipped his religion beyond the clergyman s perch. He was very exact in observing and ever playing his game, For coining some good farm proverbs he won considerable fame. He worked over time sufficient to take his turn at the bat; And found some time for picnics and fairs and frolics like that. He missed the school at Corvallis, and so for labor was fit; Nor asked his State to provide him a well filled government teat. At night when he hit the pillow he slept the sleep of the kind, A more real likeable fellow is not so easy to find. His Wife. His wife just baffles description, her soul of infinite worth; Made home a branch of her heaven, that filled its mission on earth. She laid upon love s great...
