The country on which our cultural heritage is built, Greece, was itself founded on an educational and philosophical platform that saw one generation being shown the way by a slightly older generation, men teachers and boy learners, of lovers and their beloveds, who formed a bond as inextricable as copper and tin melding into bronze, a fusion so flawless that no lover, no beloved, would ever contemplate disloyalty, from whence, at its finest, comes the true story of a captive soldier who, about to be put to death, made the final request that he be pierced through the chest and not the back, knowing that his beloved would search for him and assure his burial, and fearful only that the boy turn his head in shame should the sword wound be from behind, as though his lover had been fleeing. These were warriors, men and boys who defended Greece from barbarism, and through them laid the foundation for the freedom that is ours today. These are our heroes, those who gave their lives to the last man at the Thermopylae, those who defended their country until not one was left standing, as did the Sacred Band, those who formed the greatest fighting force the world has known to this day, the Spartans. They are the eternal lights that continue to show us the way: Pericles, Socrates, Plato, Aristotle, Leonidas, Alexander, Harmodius, themselves inspired by men of more ethereal times, Patroclus and Achilles, Orestes and Pylades, Apollo and Hyacinth, Orpheus and Hylus. These Immortals will span the first part of this book and remind us that the one factor they all shared, all of them, was the will to educate and...
