Not illustrated. 1922 Excerpt: .in order to get maximum results, to grow the finest roses. A ton of fresh cattle-manure contains on the average approximately 12 pounds of nitrogen, 3 pounds of phosphoric acid, and 9 pounds of potash. When this is applied to plants, it generally stimulates the growth of stems and leaves, due to the fact that the relatively large amount of nitrogen becomes quickly available to the plant. An excessive use of such manure will result in long, soft growth, a characteristic symptom of over-feeding with nitrogen. In other words, there is a high proportion of available nitrogen relative to the available phosphoric acid and potash. This unbalanced condition can be overcome by the use of fertilizers containing phosphoric acid and potash. When using well-rotted manure a different condition prevails, for then the nitrogen is in a form which is much less quickly available to the plant, while the phosphoric acid and the potash are available in relatively larger amounts. It is for this reason that well-decomposed manures do not produce the effects of overfeeding with nitrogen, as is the case with fresh manures. However, thoroughly decomposed manure in many cases does not contain sufficiently large amounts of available nitrogen to produce a maximum growth of stems and leaves. This is because much nitrogen is lost during the process of decay. In order to make up this deficiency of nitrogen, a fertilizer which contains nitrogen in quickly available form, such as dried blood, is sometimes used. To...
