As I said before, we have it with us always; that is, in this section. This, I think, can be attributed to the fact that the winters here are so mild we never have sufficient cold weather to kill any disease germs and also to the habits and mode of living among the natives. As a rule the houses are badly constructed and poorly ventilated; they use water from shallow wells, with the impurities found in all surface water. The practitioner in a malarial section is seldom called to a case of simple chills, as most of the people claim they can...
