How can we know, without the aid of reason, that God hath spoken. But, on the other side, is not reason proscribed by the Christian religion 1 Is not the use of reason forbidden, in the examination of the marvellous dogmas, with which we are presented by this religion? Does it not continually exclaim against a profane reason, which it accuses of insufficiency, tmd often regards as rebellious to heaven 1 In order to be capable of judging of divine revelation, we must have a just idea of the Divinity. But, seeing human reason is too weak and groveling to exalt itself to an acquaintance with the Supreme Being, from what source shall we derive that idea, beside revelation itself? Thus revelation itself is to become the proof of the authority of revelation. Let us pass on from this conjurer's circle, and open the sacred books, destined to enlighten mankind. and before which reason must fall prostrate. Do they exhibit any precise ideas of the God, whose oracles they announce? Can we draw from them any just conceptions of his attributes? Is not this God represented as a mass of contradictory -qualities, which form an explicable enigma f If this revelation be, as is supposed, an emanation from God himself, who can confide in him? Does he not paint himself as false, unjust, de.
