Not illustrated. 1922 Excerpt: .Railroad Company objectively gave a concrete idea of its plans of operation in the various locomotives, train make-ups, and methods of bringing to and carrying away from Pittsburgh the products of the district. Another float of this company luminously represented the progress in manufacturing and in transportation by a great factory on the bank of a river with railroad trains, steamboats, barges and stage coaches of the first half of the preceding century on the bank and in the river as punctuators of the progress of facilities within later years. Manufacturers had in line sixteen floats equipped by dry goods firms, commercial concerns, associated banks, the Flour and Feed Exchange, lumber dealers, and many other firms and corporations. Each of the floats was accompanied by escorts of about one hundred men, many in uniform and not a few very picturesquely attired. The floats were drawn by from four to forty horses caparisoned with the colors of Pittsburgh. The route was from the center of the city of Allegheny to Fifth avenue, Pittsburgh, to Bellefield avenue, where it was reviewed and dismissed. The Chamber of Commerce of Pittsburgh gave the guests of honor and other invited guests a dinner at the Duquesne Club. This body also tendered a reception to these guests and others in the evening. The same evening the great carnival, the masquerade, was given by those in charge in lower Fifth avenue and Liberty street that ran far into the night, a notable incident...
