Excerpt from The Meteorology of Jamaica In ancient times Meteorology included all the appearances of the heavens, whether astronomical or atmospheric. But as knowledge increased, these appearances, or phenomena, were gradually referred to either one or the other of the two divisions. Astronomy became an exact science - that is to say, all the observed motions were found to be subject to strict laws and rigorous computation; but the laws which regulate the ever-varying atmospheric motions and changes are so highly complicated, that, even at the present time, Meteorology can hardly be termed a science. But in a uniform climate like that of Jamaica the diurnal and annual variations are so far regular that observation alone affords highly valuable and practical results; and it is here proposed to give an account of some of the more important results of observation as detailed in the Jamaica Weather Reports, which were issued monthly between 1881 and 1902, and which form Vols. I., II., and III. of the Jamaica Meteorological Observations. It is also proposed to give a few simple explanations of the changes which are found to occur, with the view of rendering such knowledge as we possess practically useful, and with the hope of aiding future research.
