Excerpt: .a local infection set up by the ray fungus, taken into the system with food containing the bacilli. It is thought that the bacilli is more apt to be conveyed into the system through a vegetable diet than a diet of meat. Once the bacilli finds entrance into the intestinal track, the mucous membrane is soon attacked and later the muscular coat of the bowel, the small areas of invasion soon undergo degenerative changes that soon eventuate in ulceration, more or less severe in degree. In the early stages of the disease, the walls of the intestine become thickened from infiltration of the surrounding structures with serum, and following the ulcerative process, dark scar-tissue marks the point of attack. The caecum is a common seat of the disease and the rectum, stomach and liver are portions of the abdominal viscera, frequently attacked. Usually the onset...
