When a young writer, however, in his first attempt to attract public notice, acknowledges the immense obligations he lies under to that gentleman who has, with unremitted assiduity, conducted him in the pursuit of professional knowledge; and when he expresses his gratitude to another, whose name is deservedly famous in the republic of letters, for his polite condescension and friendly assistance, while engaged in the prosecution of his studies; a dedication, in such a case, will be universally allowed to be proper, as silence would be culpable; and the highest expressions of esteem and respect can be only considered as the effusions of a grateful mind.
