University of Toronto Press, Canada, 1995. Paperback. Condition: New. Language: English . Brand New Book  Print on Demand .Confederation in 1867 brought with it the creation of the Province of Ontario, a relief to legislators who had had to endure the uneasy union between Upper and Lower Canada; the dualism had demanded double-barrelled ministries and the four-year rotation of the capital, after 1849, between Toronto and Quebec City. The year 1867 was therefore a watershed, for it demanded that a civil service be put in place, as well as a lieutenant-governor, an executive council, and a legislative assembly. However, the election of the Whitney government in 1905 is perceived by J.E. Hodgetts as an equally important dividing point. Before 1905, the province met the fairly rudimentary needs of a largely agrarian community by relying on local authorities and the assistance of private clientele and charitable associations. Thus administration was at arm s length. It placed minimal demands on a minuscule staff and the simple structures of the emergent public service. James Whitney s arrival in 1905 coincided with the growth of natural resource industries in the north and the need to create agencies to deal with them. Developing urbanization and industrialization were accompanied by technological advances in communication and transportation, and these too required regulation. This prompted the hands-on administrative mode, and the hands increased in number with the creation of new organizational satellites, the expansion and consolidation of departments, and the emergence of central agencies to reform, coordinate, and control. These strands of economic development and parallel administrative bodies weave the substance of Hodgetts history of the Ontario civil service from Confederation until the beginning of the Second World War. Hodgetts has analysed carefully the factors that led to the gradual enlargement of the government s functions and...
