The Act of 1918 makes a very heavy demand upon the resources of the country for the education and training of the thousands of new teachers it will require. The Universities alone can meet this need, and I shall try to sketch in outline the measures which will enable us in Oxford to do our part, and at the same time to show what is involved in any thorough system of training of University standard. It is a truism to say that the Act of 1918 marks a revolution in the public education of this country. It marks the final disappearance of the ideas which have dominated public education for more than a century, and the triumph of the newer ideas which have been gaining strength during the last generation, especially since the Act of 1902. It means the transformation of the national schools from a Primary into a Secondary system; and it means, however imperfectly, in one form or another Secondary education for all. Let me remind you of the main provisions of the Act. It insists upon attendance at an Elementary school to the age of 14 for all who have not already been transferred to another type...
