Excerpt from The Effect of Bone Ash in the Diet on the Gastro-Intestinal Conditions of Dogs: Dissertation Submitted in Partial Fulfilment of the Requirements for the Degree of Doctor of Philosophy, in the Faculty of Pure Science of Columbia University Ash. The amount of ash that was excreted in the urine was practically constant; in the last two experiments it was almost identical for each period. This fact indicates that there was no appreciable absorption of the inorganic constituents of the administered bone ash, although such an absorption might occur without any corresponding increase in the amount of urinary ash. In two cases there was a decrease and in the two others a slight increase of urinary ash during the dosage period. The amount of fecal ash was, of course, very much greater for the periods during which bone ash was given. The large amount of fecal ash for the after period in three of the four experiments showed that considerable bone ash persisted in the intestinal tract and was not completely eliminated for several days. With the first animal practically complete elimination of ingested bone ash occurred within twenty four hours after the interruption of the treatment with bone ash. The daily average amount of fecal ash in the corresponding after period was gm., practically the same as that of the fore period, gm.
