Brand New Book. Excerpt from Louisiana Conservationist, Vol. 14: July-August, 1962 At that time, oil and gas exploration had brought about a new type of salt water fishing. The drilling rigs and platforms had attracted exciting numbers of new fish. Rig fishing became popular. Fantastic catches of red snappers, blue fish, big white trout, cobia, Spanish mackerel, sleek king mackerel, pompano, and a dozen other species that set up housekeeping in season under and around the rigs were made. The popularity of rig fishing has not waned but increased through the years. Like spiders of steel, standing on many legs the rigs dotted the coastal waters of Louisiana. At first, all of them were within sight of land. At night, the lights on the rigs twinkled like far-near stars in the blackness of the gulf. Fishermen also found a nightly bonanza around the flares where waste gas sent leaping flames high into the sky, attracting fish much as moths are attracted to a flame. But those spiderlike platforms, costly and...
