The current state of people exiting religious institutions in America are increasing at alarming rates. Change and Innovation may be the key to congregational sustainability and growth. A willingness to challenge the status quo and to retain and grow congregational membership with new and diverse worship methodologies is becoming the norm for survival for many congregations. The continual danger confronting religious institutions is irrelevancy. Congregations are going through a renaissance of change in offering various types of worship experiences and options for their various member and stakeholder groups. Many congregations are at the crossroads of change and are witnessing a mass exodus of many members who are becoming less satisfied that their corporate worship experiences are meeting their 21st Century lifestyle needs. In a rapidly changing world thriving congregations tend to change and innovate themselves, as opposed to, struggling congregations who fear change and have difficulty in revising their overall operations and membership offerings. Many progressive congregations are redefining their vision, mission, community involvement and congregational offerings. Progressive congregations are becoming more inclusive in the process of growing spiritual vitality among current and new members and identifying 21st Century lifestyle offerings to attract prospective members. A wiliness to challenge the status quo and to attract new members with diverse worship, leadership and community opportunities appear to be showing some signs of growing congregations. Congregational leaders need not choose between tradition and innovation. A new way of thinking aligns these two together and provides ongoing vitality and growth within religious institutions. Congregational leadership is the most important aspect for institutional creativity and innovation. No congregation can transform or renew itself unless the leaders put the process in motion and sustain...
