The Capture of Middelburg. A. The Siege. HARDLY had Treslong arrived at Flushing when he began to devise means to force Middelburg, Zeeland s capital, to take sides with the prince. It was known that the majority of the city s inhabitants were favorable to the cause of their country s freedom. But the magistrates, and most of the prominent families, considering chiefly their own interests, were inclined to Spain. A very strong Spanish garrison, moreover, guarded Middelburg against attack from without, and prevented any patriotic demonstration from within. The original garrison had been augmented by adding the Spanish soldiers destined for, and stationed at, Flushing, but who, on April 6th and following days, had been repulsed and driven out. But the impetuous Treslong decided to attack, under any conditions, this central Spanish stronghold. Gathering together his Sea Beggars, and as...
